HUMAN BEAUTY.

The Real Meaning of a Lovely Face.

character and the beauty of aspect. It is not uncommon to hear this connection fatly denied, and many cases where grand natures exist behind plain faces, and charming faces cover mean souls, are cited as proof that there is no relation between them. But these exceptions no more destroy the general truth of the law than the height of lofty mountains destroys the rotundity of the earth. They may also be rotundity of the earth. They may also be seconded for by the fact that the commingling of different natures, constitutions and physiques in marriage produces a secondary irregular combination of characteristics in the offspring, and in proportion to the organic incongruity of the parents will be the variableness of quality and feature in the children.

fouture in the children. THE GENERAL LAW, that those aspects which we consider beau tiful accompany superiority of mind and character, and those which we pronounce plain and unpleasing accompany a like in-feriority, is evident from any intelligent survey of the history of civilization, of the gradual effects of outture and refinement upon the features, and the more direct and apparent result of the emotions, the passions and the will in creating or marring facial beauty. That there is a profound and almost universal conviction of the truth of almost universal conviction of the truth of the truth of the truth of the slaw, in spite of the apparent contradictions, is seen in the common surprise that is mainlested when a mean action is committed by one of noble bearing. "Who would have been great battles: twenty-six fortresses thought one with so frank and open a face could have been guilty of deceit and fraud?" tured. The savage, who feares with his teeth what we cut with a knife, or soften by cooking, has a larger jaw, and every increase of skill, agacity and intelligence putting more and better tools in his hands has a fendency to make his organ recode, thus showing the organic connection between mental interiority and a protruberance of jaw. This is but an illustration of many other facial changes, which are due to mental and moral improvement. THE LLATTENED NOST. the high cheek bone, the conspicuous nos tril, the wide space between the eyes, the thick lip and receding forehead, are all attendants on a low state of uniture, and are likewise considered prejudicial to beauty. Nevertheless, we are constrained to say that in our opinion a great deal of the odium which surrounds Bridget, and which has excited so much prejudice not only against her countrymen, but against her ancestors in American eyes, has a very insufficient foundation in reason. There are two char-acters in which she is the object of public suspicion and dislike—(1) as a cook; (2) as a member of a household As a cook Bridget is an admitted failure. But cooking is, it is now generally acknowledged, very much an affair of instinct, and this justinet seems to be very strong in some races and very weak in others, though why the French should have it highly developed and the Irish be almost altogether deprived of it, is a question which would require an essay to itself. No amount of teaching will make a person a good cook who is not himself fond of good food, and has not a delicate palate, for it is the palate which must test the value of rules. We may deduce from this the conclusion which experience justifies, that women are not naturally good cooks. They have had the cookery of the world in their hands for several thousand world in their hands for several thousand years, but all the marked advances in the art, and indeed all that can be called the cultivation of it, have been the work of pressed forward to greet him was a wizened near.
